2 As this book goes to press, we have learned of cross-sector multi-stakeholder networks viewed as a source or form of governance. For an introduction to this idea, see for example

<http://networkingaction.net/2016/12/transformation-governance-is-taking-ff/>

and

<http://www.circleforward.us/2016/12/30/the-path-forward-is-under-our-feet/>

However, we have found no investigations regarding conditions enabling such networks to produce collective wisdom as defined in this chapter, so we have left that for a later edition of this book. In the meantime, it is suggested that much of the discussion here regarding participatory civic wisdom could be applied to such networks, as well, and that the two forms of governance could be usefully woven into integrated visions.

3 This perspective is consistent with the green economic critique of GDP as primarily a measure of monetized activity that obscures and neglects the vast and fundamental role of non-monetized need-satisfying activity.

9 Linear in the sense of one-way power, an exertion of will directed towards a specific outcome desired by the party exercising the power, rather than a responsive or collaborative exercise of power towards a co-created outcome desired by all involved.

10 Holistic in the sense of including more of the whole – more parties, more factors, more interests and needs – including the needs and gifts of the whole group, the whole community, the whole society, the whole world – and pursuing one's aims in the context of aligning with and working with these.
